The Partnership for Medicaid Condemns Racism, Recognizes it as a Public Health Crisis

The Partnership for Medicaid condemns violent acts resulting in unnecessary deaths of black Americans and other people of color. As a coalition consisting of 23 organizations committed to health equity, the Partnership for Medicaid opposes discrimination, exclusion, and disparate access to essential resources that undermine the health, well-being, and lives of people of color. Further, as a partnership committed to improving and expanding the Medicaid program, we know we must work to prevent the continued marginalization of minorities in the health care system, as well as in our society at large. We commit ourselves to reducing racial inequities within our health care system and urge all stakeholders to treat racism as the public health crisis it is.

People of color make up more than half of non-elderly Medicaid enrollees, yet lag behind white counterparts significantly in health and wellness outcomes. It is estimated that roughly 84,000 African Americans die annually due to health disparities. The current COVID-19 pandemic, which has disproportionately affected people of color, has simply laid bare the magnitude of this problem.

Medicaid has evolved dramatically in its capacity to promote quality of care for the millions of people it covers. Yet we recognize that if Medicaid programs and we, their partners, continue to pursue innovations, without first addressing the underlying role that racism plays in health and social inequalities, health disparities will continue to persist. It is incumbent upon us all to confront these threats and to overcome the inequities that afflict racial and ethnic minorities.

Together, speaking with one voice, the Partnership for Medicaid condemns racism in all forms. We must do better.
